

Reprinted from

REAL ESTATE WEEKLY

May 10, 2017

Council of Urban Real Estate Hosts 2017 Real Estate Trends Symposium

The Council of Urban Real Estate (CURE) hosted its 2017 Real Estate Trends Symposium at The Cornell Club in New York City.

Speakers included l-r: Doug Giles, executive vice president, CURE; Jeff Barclay, managing director, Goldman Sachs, Ken McIntyre, PassPort Realty; Cherie Santos-Wuest, managing partner, Celadon Venture Advisors; Sam Chandan, associate dean, NYU SPS Schack Institute of Real Estate; Kendrick Harris, president, CURE and Devon Prioleau, board member, CURE.

Panelists provided a forecast as to what lies ahead for the real estate market in 2017 including the continuing transition of New York City's development boom from housing to mega infrastructure projects.

The event also included an in-depth examination of these projects and their impacts, as well as insights on the ultimate economic advantages these projects will provide to the neighborhoods surrounding them and New York City's economy in general. The event was attended by New York City real estate industry's top executives.

"We were able to attract over 100 juniors to senior level real estate professionals, to join us on a cold rainy morning to hear three esteemed and highly recognized real estate leaders give their insights on the trends in the real estate market," said Kendrick Harris, Esq., President of the Council of Urban Real Estate. "For over 25 years, our organization has produced high quality, informative real estate programs — such as this year's Symposium."